The exhibition title is a nod to a Shel Silverstein poem in which “all the colors I am inside have not been invented yet.” The series is a manifestation of Achak’s own “spiritual curiosity” that she has created instinctively over the years, resulting in a body of work that explores different thematic directions than her previous projects. Over time, Achak knits together this intimate narrative of dreamy portraits and surreal landscapes that evoke the unseen elements of energy and intuition that shape our lives.

Achak is preoccupied by nature as a grounding yet transformative element. In Cherry Blossoms, Fallen, a raised flower bed is completely covered in cherry blossom flowers, dropped from an unseen tree. The shape of the ephemeral blossoms over a pine wood flower bed is vaguely grave-like, capturing a beautiful and contemplative moment of transition. Wild Carrot depicts a small white flowering plant standing among a shadowy forest, in a work that celebrates beauty and the darker mysteries of the inner self.
